EU AND TURKEY REACH REFUGEE DEAL

POLITICO.EU

European leaders signed a sweeping refugee pact with Turkey Friday, securing a hard-fought deal they hope will reduce the flow of asylum-seekers into the EU and calm a crisis that has tested the bloc's unity like nothing in its 65-year history.

"The talks were tough but fair, not everything that was said was to our liking," European Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker said afterward, but "the agreement... is in accordance with the law, there can be no doubt about that. It meets all EU and international law requirements."

Under the agreement, Ankara will take back Syrian migrants who reach Greece illegally in return for the relocation in Europe of Syrian refugees now in Turkey. Europe hopes forcing refugees back to Turkey will dissuade them from crossing the Aegean, while also upending the human-smuggling trade. Nearly all the refugees arriving in Europe from Syria do so via Turkey.

In return for Turkey's agreement, the EU will grant visa-free travel to Turkish citizens, as soon as this summer, accelerate Ankara's EU membership application and increase financial aid to help Turkey manage the refugee crisis by €3 billion to €6 billion.

The deal took effect on Sunday. The starting date was crucial because leaders wanted to avoid unleashing a rush of refugees trying to reach the EU before it went into force.

The information was gathered by the Commission as part of its ongoing antitrust sector inquiry into the e-commerce sector, launched in May 2015. In particular, the replies from more than 1400 retailers and digital content providers from all 28 EU Member States show that geo-blocking is common in the EU for both consumer goods and digital content. 38% of the responding retailers selling consumer goods and 68% of digital content providers replied that they geo-block consumers located in other EU Member States.

The objective is to enhance road safety, contribute to a fairer competition between road transport operators and to facilitate a consistent enforcement of EU rules across borders.
