TERRORISM HITS ECONOMIC GROWTH, AS COMMISSION UNVEils SPRING FORECAST

EURACTIV.COM

Security concerns and the risk of new terrorist attacks are expected to further damage European economies in the next few months, against a backdrop of the weak economic growth seen in the EU over the last years, the European Commission warned in its spring economic forecasts on Tuesday.

The Commission said that output will continue to grow but will not accelerate "significantly" as the boost from the cheap oil and the euro's depreciation will soon fade away.

The executive expects a GDP growth of 1.6% for the eurozone this year and 1.8% in 2017, compared with 1.6% and 1.9% predicted in the winter forecast.

For the EU as a whole, the economy will grow by 1.8% in 2016 and 1.9% in 2017, compared with 1.9% and 2% expected in the previous forecast.

While Europe recently returned to a pre-crisis economic level, the situation could easily worsen as risks and uncertainty are "extraordinarily high", Mario Buti, Director General of Economic and Financial Affairs, wrote in the forecast.

The executive underlined that "the impact on confidence of increased security concerns is set to weigh on the growth outlook particularly in some member states."

The largest impact will be felt in Belgium and France, as the Paris and Brussels attacks in November and March respectively damaged consumer confidence and spending.

The Commission expects economic growth in Europe to remain moderate. According to its spring forecast, euro area growth is expected to be 1.6% and EU growth 1.8% in 2016.
